March-To new beginnings, It's time to unfold a new chapter

March is the month of expectation. You have to consider your career, the way you see the ocean, deciding that wave you are going to take and that wave you are not going to take. A number of the waves are huge, some are small and sometimes, the ocean goes to be calm. Your career isn't about to be one steady march upward to glory.

Entrepreneurship Development Cell wishes you the best for your new beginnings and new chapters.

Employee Retention and Strategies

A company or an organization is an association of individuals who perform tasks for that enterprise. Moreover, employees working together during a company usually share a standard purpose. These people unite their skills and resources to realize the specified goals.

And you don't want to lose out on your employee, do you?

Retention, motivation, growth are all terms interrelated to every other. Employees who receive the expansion, hike, promotion and exposure are expected to feel motivated. They feel motivated to figure, are satisfied with their work and thus remain with the organization.

According to Business Dictionary, it defines employee retention is "an effort by a business to maintain a working environment which supports current staff in remaining with the company."So, employee retention is the effort taken by an organization to hold on to its employees. Moreover, if the company is having low or high employee retention it is directly going to impact the company's employee turnover. Employee turnover is that the employee(s) replaces an employee who is leaving. A high turnover rate means the typical tenure of an employee during a company is a smaller amount than others. And it results due to conflicts in the workplace, low employee morale. Some other elements are lack of motivation, lack of exposure, low salaries, etc.

Knowing and managing your company's employee turnover rate is essential if you want to stay in the market for the long haul. If your employee turnover is above the typical for your industry, it's impossible to determine a positive atmosphere within the office.

Foster a positive work atmosphere by promoting employees, providing competitive pay and benefits and a healthy work-life balance.

Therefore, to manage and avoid a high turnover rate, retaining key employees becomes important.

Some of the best practices and strategies for employee retention carried by various companies and organization: -

Ø Making employee engagement as much as it is possible

Ø Hiring the right people at the right time

Ø Be a Brand that employee can be proud of

Ø Rewarding and recognizing the employees

Ø Flexible working environment

Ø Continuous training and development

Interrelationship between Businesses and Politics

The linkages between politics and business organizations, though existent since eras have become more obvious and evident in this era of technology where no deal or agenda can be kept under the wraps for long. There are various terms like responsibility, accountability, favors, etc used interchangeably in the context of relations between businesses and government.

In today's global economy even though businessmen and entrepreneurs are the driving force of the economy, the government still controls the direction and the shaping of the economy. In modern democracies, the political representatives of the people have the right and the responsibility to formulate the regulatory economic framework which the businesses are expected to follow while conducting and managing their business. It is not uncommon that these policies may not be in line with the pre-decided plans and strategies of a business organization(s). “Whether it’s the government's business to be in business?”. Should the policies regarding how a business should function be in the hands of the government may be debatable but it is a fact of the current business scenario.

Hence to sway the policies in their favor there are always multiple attempts by businesses to form informal and mutually beneficial relationships with politicians and bureaucrats for which there are always ‘lobbyists’ seen in the corridors of government offices and institutions. The mutuality and reciprocity between businesses and politics have been institutionalized for a long time now. Politicians forming policies that directly/indirectly benefit their business friends or partners and they in return supporting the political and election campaigns is evident if we closely study the history of the business world.

This gives rise to another issue that has become a huge problem for countries – Corruption. This can range from unfair bidding processes for government contracts, unfair loan processing, etc in return for financial help to political parties or individual influential ministers. To secure these resources politics becomes a personal family affair as you need trustworthy people and this, in turn, gives rise to dynasty politics or indirect dictatorship as seen in various political situations in the world. The reciprocal relationship becomes more crucial when the government policymakers have stakes in business organizations. It is not possible to quantify the influence big businesses have on government policies but one can be sure that it is not trivial.

When studying the relationship between politics and businesses it is important that one also looks at the benefits of a sound relationship between the two. The government may plan various socially and economically beneficial schemes for the common population but without support from the private businesses, it is always difficult for the government to successfully implement those policies. The philanthropic contributions from some big businesses have largely helped for enhancing the impact of social welfare plans and policies of the government. A well-tuned unit of government and businesses working together can improve the infrastructure and the economy of the country, maintain steady and upward growth, provide jobs and bring financial security to the common people of the country.

Hence, in conclusion, we can say linkages between the government and businesses if monitored can be greatly beneficial for the country but if left unchecked can have various adverse effects.

The pandemic came, bringing along with it the pros n cons. It brought about a great revolution in the field of education. Everyone was compelled to shift on to the digital platform for the transfer of knowledge. The innovative entrepreneurs took this as a golden opportunity and came up with an online educational application, VirtualE which was the need of the hour. It definitely wasn't a piece of cake to weave this project.

There were quite a few hurdles that had to be battled with. To begin with, deciding the board, selection of the teachers who excel in their subject, hiring the best production team, finding the most appropriate place for the studio and the list goes on. But every bend made us brainstorm and steered us towards the pinnacle of success!

Prosumer: Be Your Own Producer

We often heard that society is divided into two sections one is the producer and another is a consumer. One creates goods and services and the other consumes them. Many economic, cultural and social philosophies are based on this theory. But in modern times this concept of producer and consumer is changing.

Nowadays many people are both producers and consumers at the same time. These individuals are known as 'Prosumer 'which is an amalgamation of two words Producer or Provider and Consumer. People who have solar panels on their roofs are prosumer because they produce electricity at the same time they consume it too.

The idea of prosumer has arisen in the early 20th Century but the actual implementation of the idea started to happen in the late 20th century because of improvement in technology and increase of awareness in consumers. But in the 21st Century, we can see the implementation of this idea on a large scale. Now people are content creators and consumers on social media, various software available in the market gives the opportunity to users to customize it according to their needs. Prosumers have different types such as DIY prosumers, self-service prosumers, customizing prosumers, collaborative prosumers, monetized prosumers, and economic prosumers, etc.

This phenomenon also attracts some backlash from industry experts and economists who said this is another form of exploitation because although prosumers produce products they are not paid by the companies and this idea leads to job loss of many employees. Another criticism is this concept benefits some individuals only who have expertise or resources and others don't have any advantages.

Despite its criticism, prosumers will only flourish more in the future due to advancements in technologies like 3D printing, AI and virtual reality. The only question is can you become a prosumer?

The holiday is back but now it's called a WORKCATION

"Workcation?" my friend said incredulously. "What the heck is that?"

I thought a workplace was a commonly known phenomenon within the career world. But seems, it's something that few realize.

But here we were, each spending week working remotely from other places. We still click-clacked away on our laptops for about eight hours every day. To answer the emails, and to attend meetings via video hangout.

We just did it from a patio within the Dominican Republic and a cool cafe in Washington, DC rather than our office in NY.

Now, let me answer a subsequent question I always got when talking about what I used to be doing: "Why not just take an actual vacation?"

Taking a workcation gives you an opportunity to urge a change of scenery, without using your precious vacation days. you still get to enjoy a fun new place or spend time with far-off loved ones during your nights and weekends (and lunches), but you don't get to affect the strain of preparing for, missing, and recovering from a week off of labor.

So now the question is how one can really make this happen?" Simply by following certain things:

Choose Your 'Cation

Choosing the right place for a workcation may be a little different than choosing one for an actual vacation. Ideally, you would like to travel somewhere where you won't be upset that you simply don't have your days to explore. In other words, avoid places where there's plenty you would like to try to or where the most attractions happen during the day.

Better options for workcations? Cities where you want to live (you won't want to tour around an excessive amount of, but will have any time to go to with family or friends in your off-hours), relaxing destinations with Wi-Fi all around (think resorts where you'll feasibly sit back the pool and work), or destinations where you don't care an excessive amount of about site-seeing but just want to urge a pity the place (I recently did this in London and was ready to get my few top attractions in on the weekend, and then just enjoy eating out and hanging call at pubs during the week after work).

In other words, save the African safari or the trip around Southeast Asia for your actual vacation, and go somewhere a touch more low-key for this trip.

Ask Your Boss

I understand how it might be easy to think that the majority of bosses won't be down with this concept. But with an honest deal of labor increasingly done remotely, posing for a workcation should become easier and easier.

The key's to first acknowledge that it's a touch of a weird request, then show why it might not only be better for you but ultimately a bonus for the corporate by keeping you cheerful and productive.

Try something along these lines: I do know this is often kind of strange and won't be feasible, I used to be wondering if I could work remotely every week this summer.

Then, go on to explain the circumstances:

I think being out of the office would help me clear my head and work more effectively [insert big project].

Or: I'd wish to be with my family in the week and would rather continue working so as to not leave the corporate hanging or let [insert project] stagnate.

At now, you ought to even be prepared to speak through a number of the logistics of how this may work. You can talk specifics closer to the particular date, but explain about what percentage hours each day you'll plan on checking in, how you'll stay in-tuned, and what work your boss can still calculate you to try to.

Get Prepped

As your workcation gets closer, it's time to actually come up with an idea for a way the week will play out. There are a few things to think about and ask your boss about:

·Be very clear about once you are going to be working—and once you won't be—so your boss and team know exactly what to expect.

·Thereto end, if you're getting to need a day or a day or two off during some time away, attempt to work that out as early as possible.

·Discuss how you'll be reached while you're away. Will you be available over chat? How often will you be checking email?

·Decide which meetings you'll be able or expected to attend while you're away, and plan for how you'll join in on them.

·If there's any work you'll have to pass off for any reason, make an idea for that.

Be Productive—and Have Fun!

You've planned, you've jetted off, and now it's time to possess a touch of fun (while staying productive, of course)! There are a few things I've found helpful for having a rejuvenating and fun time—and still getting my work done.

First, even as you were clear with your boss and team about once you would be working, be clear with yourself and any friends you're visiting or traveling with. It is often far too easy to fall under the trap of either working too many hours so as to prove that you're still being productive, or not working enough because you say yes to each friend who asks if you would like to satisfy up for breakfast or start drinking at 3 PM. Understand when you're, and be firm about it.

That being said, don't be afraid to require some breaks during the day to enjoy yourself. I'll often rise up on the sooner side, play a piece of labor within the morning, then take an actual lunch break (no sad desk salads allowed on workcation) or even explore a new neighborhood and meet up with someone.

Finally, make sure to change locations! Nothing's worse than traveling somewhere fun than spending the majority of sometime sitting in your bedroom ahead of your computer. So, switch it up! To compute on the balcony or by the pool. Find a cafe in a different neighborhood every day to figure from. One day from London, I even worked from a flowery hotel lounge while enjoying afternoon tea! As long as you've got access to Wi-Fi (do thorough research on this before heading out—nothing is worse than scrambling to seek out the internet in an unfamiliar place) and a quiet enough place to require any calls or meetings, you'll still get your work done while enjoying what your destination has got to offer.

It is possible that workcation wouldn't be very relaxing, but one will always come back refreshed and ready to work even harder than before.
